I recently purchased a used F100 along with an older manual focus Nikkor lens. Reading the manual, it says that Aperture priority metering should work. But regardless of what f-stop I set the lens, it picks a shutter speed as if the lens is wide open, so if I set the aperture at, say, f/5.6, the frame will be severely underexposed.

The AF sensors in the F100 briefly light in red when selected and are very easy to see, while the F5's AF sensors are black LCD superimposed over the viewing screen, which can be difficult to see in some lighting and with some subjects.

Nikon F100 Review | by Thom Filmbodies | Thom Hogan

Nikon's pro F5 had been out for about three years when the F100 arrived on store shelves. Billed as a less expensive but still plenty capable pro-consumer camera, the F100 packs most every feature found on the F5 in a smaller, lighter package. That's the first thing I noticed
